trust to evaluate my medical treatment? Caregivers: Your healthcare team Practices seeking compensation for work they did on a patient's behalf have been the subject of a study by the Dartmouth Atlas and other publications and commentators. The centerpiece of the study seems to be a new perspective by a key contributor, Dartmouth hospital president Dr. George Barnes, on whose behalf The Dartmouth Atlas compiled an extensive and detailed dataset of claims in the New Hampshire lawsuit. Dr. Barnes says that he (and his team) seeks to be fair, to not cherry-pick data, and to "do the best job [we] can" in analyzing the case. But the implications of his "I am not a doctor" statement have put pressure on critics of the study and of the specific sources on whose behalf the study was performed. He says he is also "not a lawyer," and thus concludes from his description that the purpose of the study was "to make a scholarly contribution." Based on his description, it is hard to understand why he concludes that the study was "not designed for the purpose of influencing the outcome of the lawsuit." It
